The title:

“Life is getting better, but not with the same speed to everybody”

And short introduction:

From 19th century, the social developments in Europe have been quicker as never before, and the speed is rising. The good side is, that life is now better for everybody, when compared with the year 1800, 1900 or even with year 2000. The challenge is, that both the speed and the possibilities for better life have not been the same for everybody. In general, men are doing much better off than women, families without children have better possibilities than families with children and if we talk about Estonia, people elder than 50 years get less salary than young people. These are just some examples, depicting the social systematic, structural gaps.

The quicker the developments, the harder it is for people with any special needs to be on board. Digitalization has evoked new forms of participation in the wealth, but also new ways of been left out.
